November 21, 2016 (St. Louis, MO) – The Contemporary Art Museum St. Louis (CAM) presents an extensive selection of major paintings and works on paper by Nicola Tyson, the first major solo exhibition of the artist’s work in a museum in the United States. All the works selected for CAM were completed over an eleven-year period, from 2005 to 2016, and will be on view January 27 through April 16, 2017. A British-native currently living in upstate New York, Tyson is engaged in the reimagining of the figure, or more precisely reimagining the gaze upon the female body. She is noted for her “psycho-figuration,” a practice that erases the distinctions between representation and abstraction and expresses the inner psyche of its subjects. Her portraiture undermines specificity, bodies morphing into creatures or unidentified selves turned inside out. Although often comic in nature, these representations of fractured personae also possess a quiet poignancy.

A number of Tyson’s dynamic large-scale paintings will be on view. Whether working in oil or acrylic, her paintings contain a loose gestural quality even as they convey a subtle mastery, distinguishing Tyson as a colorist with a distinctive chromatic palette and painterly inclinations. She brings to figurative painting a necessary revitalization, combined with her delight in what has been described as her work’s “inexhaustible weirdness.” Also part of the exhibition will be new works from her ongoing Portrait

Heads series. In the early 2000s Tyson began her investigations into portraiture through a monoprint process, quickly achieving her image by painting acrylic on glass, then pressing the glass onto paper. These headshots gaze unnervingly at the viewer, ghoulish, as if protective layers of self have been stripped like bark from a tree, yet with personality and humanity retained.

Both small, graphite-on-paper and large-scale ink drawings will be on view. In contrast to the thoughtful time and care brought to the paintings, the artist chooses to create drawings swiftly so as not to impede the imaginative process, “…to stay just ahead of the cage of language,” she has said, “the linear mind and rational decision-making.” Despite Tyson’s rapid facility, the individual works reveal extraordinary draftsmanship.

Tyson is frequently associated with such artists as Maria Lassnig and Tyson contemporary Nicole Eisenman—both have exhibited at CAM—and their feminist redefinition of the female figure in relationship to identity and the social gaze. Tyson is also aware of her male forbearers and their expressions of the female body, artists that include Édouard Manet, Egon Schiele, Pablo Picasso, Max Beckmann, and Francis Bacon. Her epistolary monologues to these artists have been collected into a book, Dead Letter Men, and Tyson performs readings of the letters, often as part of her exhibitions. The letters are funny, satirical, pointed, personal, self-reflective, and pose underlying questions of “Who draws the figure?” and “Whose figure is it?” She will read from Dead Letter Men at CAM, Thursday, April 6, 6:30 pm.

In the process of reconstructing or breaking down the figure, Tyson’s surreal depictions of morphed humanity contain a gentle humor. Her gaze reveals the physicality of the body and its vulnerabilities, and the capacity to laugh at those vulnerabilities—the shared human comedy.

This exhibition is generously supported by Petzel Gallery, New York, and Susanne Vielmetter Los Angeles Projects.
