

Ad Minoliti: Manifestación pluriversal

Known for their inventive explorations of South American Modernist painting traditions, Ad Minoliti's work draws on the legacy of geometric abstraction in their native country of Argentina, where it was used as a tool to imagine utopian political and social alternatives in the 1940s. While Minoliti was inspired by the artwork and social goals these artists espoused, they also understood the ways these movements excluded women, and sensed a restrictiveness in their historic manifestos.

Minoliti's work is infused with inclusive, non-binary, and feminist perspectives, and it offers a fresh lens on art history and aesthetics. They combine abstraction, vibrant colors, and playful figuration drawn from both Modernist codes and children's book illustrations. Minoliti challenges the art world's self-seriousness by advocating for inclusivity, approachability, and more joyous experiences. "Why is it," they ask, "that something we call 'cute' can't also be seen as serious?"

For Manifestación pluriversal, Minoliti has selected multiple components to create a vibrantly colored mural for CAM's Project Wall that is 54 feet long and 12 feet high. Its colors are drawn from the colors of pride flags: purple and yellow from the Non-Binary Pride Flag, blue and pink from the Trans Pride Flag, and brown from the Progress Pride Flag, which recognizes communities of color. The green is a signature color for Argentinian feminist movements. Hanging atop the mural are five of Minoliti's square paintings on canvas. Several black-and-white shapes—a snail, a flower, a puppy, and an owl—that Minoliti found in an instructional book on drawing have been fabricated in wood and integrated into the composition.

Manifestación pluriversal also features more than a dozen life-sized self-portraits created by young artists from Proud Art STL, an organization that fosters community for LGBTQIA+ youth in St. Louis. The self-portraits were created in a workshop led by the artist and facilitated by CAM's Learning and Engagement department. These self-portraits offer the young artists' responses to the questions: What moves you? What are you fighting for? and What do you want to achieve? When the exhibition closes, the self-portraits will return to their creators.

In Spanish, the word manifestación can be translated as a rally, protest march, or demonstration. Pluriversal, in Spanish and English, refers to the notion of a pluriverse: a place where multiple realities exist simultaneously. Different from the singular universe, many worlds can coexist in a pluriverse. Minoliti's Manifestación pluriversal makes space for celebration and demonstrates their belief that to share in the joy of discovery, everyone should feel welcome.

Ad Minoliti: Manifestación pluriversal is organized for the Contemporary Art Museum St. Louis by Dean Daderko, Ferring Foundation Chief Curator.

This exhibition is generously supported in part by Nancy and Kenneth Kranzberg and Ann Yeatman Sheehan Charitable Trust.
